I Am

Knowing who and what you are seems to be a great problem in our current culture. You cannot deny that this statement is true, even if you have sequestered yourself away from all “social” media. And if we are honest, having this knowledge of self may have always been a struggle (at least since sin became a problem). We seem to always be in states of change, maturing from one role of life into another. Babies become toddlers. Toddlers become kids. Kids go through a great morphing stage of adolescence to become teens (an interesting recently created category). We even have transition terms for adulthood from young to senior. This is just one facet of our changing identity in life. We change with relationships, in gaining and losing. We change in careers and our studies. And several other areas of our identities are affected by time and the stories that surround ours. The problem is that if we focus too much and only on these changes, we may never know who we are.

We must remember that there are several areas of our identity that do not change. They define who and what we are so boldly that they cannot be changed no matter how hard we try. One way of looking at these realities of the unchanging areas of your identity is to think of a jeweler working with a diamond. No matter how many times he cuts, chips and works the diamond to make less or more faces, it is still a diamond.

Jesus emphatically enters into our struggles of knowing ourselves, through the changing facets and the solid truths, by boldly revealing the unchanging nature of Himself to us. He invites us into the truth of who we really are by announcing who He really is. He does this by saying, “I am...”

We are beginning a series in which we will look at the “I Am” statements of Jesus. Our challenge will be to seek the truth of these amazing claims in order to find out who He really is and the invitation He has presented in knowing who we really are. May we have the courage and wisdom to seek Him first that we may know our true selves.

Next Sunday, March 6th - SNT!!! We will get together after church for some fellowship and fun! Plan on eating lunch together as we choose our own adventure! Will it be games, sports, movies, or something else?! You get to help decide!
